Khayaletu and Tennyson House are homeless children projects who are often infected or affected by HIV and AIDS. These projects engage in prevention and early intervention work with children, youth and their families from communities that are at-risk of children and youth turning to life on the streets. The aim is to reunite families, and strengthen and hold families together. The projects intervention is to build a bridging program with developmental activities for children from the streets, place them temporarily in a shelter where they take part in a rehabilitation program and then move them to permanent care, either home or alternative family care.
